1. Discuss an island in time you have experienced in which two or more people have worked well together, a time when two or more people have brought into being an accomplishment or quality that neither could have brought about alone. As a group, discuss the lesson in these stories and how they can apply to the community you live and work in.

2. Have each of you describe what learning together means to you. How do you practice learning in a daily way? How do you learn from others? And how can you support the power and practice of learning in your family and community?

3. Have each of you describe your own relationship with scarcity and abundance. Tell the story of a time when you lived in fear that there wouldn't be enough, and tell the story of a time when you felt certain that there would be enough. As a group, discuss if your community operates out of a sense of scarcity or abundance, or a mix of both. Then, identify what you can give to an area of scarcity in your community.

4. Describe one gift you inherently have to offer the world. Then, as a group, explore how you might extend and combine your gifts to make a difference.
